those details until I read what he said in the newspaper. If the young man was indeed suicidal, maybe next time, after what the Governor did in exposing his business to everybody, he'll try it with a gun or a knife. There have been other situations where politicians will read of a young person getting alcohol and a drug which is not purchasable over the counter and will ask, how did this young person get Ritalin? You don't purchase that over the counter. Then make a strong political statement about the easy acquisition of alcohol and illegal drugs and how something has to be done about this. But when it comes to a politician's family, that politician will say the kinds of things that I try to get us to look at all the time and make the appeal that we should be concerned about our children and see everybody's child as ours. And it shouldn't have to come into our house. But the only time we become concerned is when it comes into our house. These politicians, who will condemn other parents for backing their children when they have strayed and talk about you're a facilitator, will suddenly switch and flip when it comes into his house and say, well, I'm a parent and I'm going to stick to my child through thick and thin because that's what parents do. No, it's okay for a parent to do it when it's him. The young woman has had her business put out in the street. Yes, she's a harpy, she's a nagger, she drove this young man to the brink of suicide. So, if she works anywhere, if she has friends, you all know how cruel the public is and you know the types of things she will confront now, and you know what this young man will confront, if he goes back to work. Why, he's so unstable now, he may not be able to get a job anywhere. Then, after giving 99 out of 100 personal facts about a young man's life, the Governor then says, in his hypocritical mode, respect the young man's privacy. What, what that's private is left? Who exposed all of these personal things? The Governor, and I don't think he's exempt. And why is everybody offering prayers now, when you consider the fact that we have many children who are suffering, who are in agony, who do not have a Governor for a father, who need help? And, if you believe in prayer, why don't you give it to those children? And that's why prayers...
